

From the Dean

Last week, we gathered to learn more about police brutality and its effect on Black lives. Attended by more than 100 students, professors and staff members, we hosted a panel intended to help us better understand best practices for police training and mentoring, recent legal and policy reform efforts and why they have failed to protect our Black citizens, and how lawyers can work to help create positive change. Panelists included FSU Law's Gary & Sallyn Pajcic Professor Wayne A. Logan, a national expert in criminal law and procedure whose research areas include police search and seizure; FSU Chief of Police Terri Brown, who headed police training at FSU for 20 years; and attorney

Benjamin Crump speaks to the FSU Law community during a panel on police brutality.

Devon Jacob, a former police officer who focuses his civil rights practice exclusively on police brutality. As a special treat for attendees, FSU Law alumnus Benjamin Crump ('95) was also able to join the panel even though he is currently very busy representing the families of Ahmaud Arbery, Breonna Taylor and George Floyd, among others. Crump joined the Zoom call from Louisville, Kentucky, where he was with Breonna Taylor's mother. He talked about the important national work he is doing, including promoting "Breonna's Law," which was unanimously passed and prohibits no-knock warrants. This panel was the first in a series of educational panels planned to discuss issues of systemic racism present in the criminal justice system. We will be holding additional sessions throughout the summer and beyond and urge members of our FSU Law community to participate in these conversations.

As we think further about how to fortify diversity and inclusion at the law school, our faculty drafted a letter to leaders of the Florida House of Representatives advocating for the removal of B.K. Roberts' name from our main classroom building. A similar statement was unanimously passed by the FSU Faculty Senate earlier this week. Because the naming of our building was legislatively mandated in 1973, the statements are directed to the Florida House.
